INTRODUCTION

Action against Medical Accidents ('AvMA' – the charity for patient safety & justice) has researched the system of issuing 'patient safety alerts' to NHS trusts in England, the degree to which they are being implemented or not, and how compliance with the alerts is monitored and regulated. We are shocked by the results. Patient safety alerts are issued by the National Patient Safety Agency and contain required actions which all relevant NHS trusts are obliged to implement by the deadline given. This is one of the top 'core standards' set by the Department of Health. Alerts are only issued about those patient safety problems where the National Patient Safety Agency has evidence that they are a particular priority, usually because they cause unnecessary death or serious injuries on a repeated basis. The required actions and deadlines for implementation are the subject of intense scrutiny and consultation with experts. The main source of the data for this report is information obtained under the Freedom of Information Act from the Central Alert System, which is administered by the Department of Health. The data was current on 29th December 2009. It covers 53 patient safety alerts issued between 2004 and 2009 to all relevant NHS trusts in England.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY: KEY FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

KEY FINDINGS

- Over 300 NHS trusts (around three quarters of all trusts) had not complied with the required actions in at least one patient safety alert for which the deadline had already passed.
- There are 2,124 separate incidences of patient safety alerts not having been complied with by NHS trusts.
- 80 NHS trusts had not confirmed they had complied with 10 or more separate alerts. 35 of these trusts have 'Foundation Trust' status.
- One trust had not confirmed compliance with as many as 37 (70%) of the alerts. Two trusts failed to comply with 31 (58%) of the alerts.
- There are over 200 incidences of NHS trusts who have not complied with alerts which are over five years old (issued before December 2004).
- There is no system for monitoring implementation of alerts, or of intervening with NHS trusts who have not implemented required actions from patient safety alerts (even those with large numbers of outstanding alerts and alerts which are years past the deadline). Neither is there a robust system for checking that NHS trusts who declare themselves as being compliant actually are.
- The information about which trusts have or have not implemented the alerts is not publicly available, which is why we had to make a request under the Freedom of Information Act.

RECOMMENDATIONS

- 1 All trusts which have not implemented a patient safety alert which is past the deadline should be required to publish the reason for this having been allowed to happen in the case of each alert, and an action plan for completing the required actions. This information should be made public.
- 2 The Department of Health and Care Quality Commission should launch an immediate in-depth investigation into the patient safety arrangements at the trusts who have not implemented large numbers of outstanding alerts and/or alerts that are significantly overdue.
- 3 The Department of Health should review the overall system for promoting and regulating patient safety including the issuing of and monitoring implementation of patient safety alerts. A robust system for monitoring compliance with alerts and intervening where necessary should be introduced. The review should include the role of the various national, regional and local organisations with a role in performance management, and produce clear protocols about who should do what.
- 4 The Department of Health should make public the information on which trusts have or have not notified completion of the required actions on alerts the day after the deadline. This information should be easily available to members of the public on the Care Quality Commission's and NHS Choices' websites, and the individual NHS trusts' websites.

- 5 The boards of NHS trusts, including Foundation Trusts, should be required to have patient safety as an agenda item at each meeting, which should be held in public, and should include a progress report on implementing patient safety alerts.
- 6 Implementation of patient safety alerts by the appropriate deadline should be made a specific regulation in the Care Quality Commission registration regulations, thereby making this a statutory requirement.

BACKGROUND

What is Action against Medical Accidents (AvMA) and why are we publishing this report?

Action against Medical Accidents (AvMA) is the UK charity for patient safety and justice. Established in 1982, AvMA was responsible for raising awareness about the need to improve patient safety well before the establishment recognised it. As a result of our campaigning, and the price paid by thousands of people whose lives have been ruined or even ended as a result of medical accidents, patient safety has become number one priority for the NHS, and we now have bodies like the National Patient Safety Agency and Care Quality Commission. We support around 4,000 people every year who have been affected by medical accidents (or 'patient safety incidents' as the NHS calls them). We, and the people we work with, accept that healthcare is a complex business and accidents will sometimes happen. However, it is imperative that lessons are learnt to make things safer and that the systems that we have fought so hard to have put in place ensure that that happens. Failing to do so adds insult to injury and leaves other patients at risk.

What did we set out to find out?

We wanted to know whether the 'patient safety alerts' which are sent out to relevant NHS bodies by the National Patient Safety Agency are being fully implemented and, if not, who was responsible and what is being done about it. We wanted to understand how the whole system is regulated to maximise compliance and improve safety. Lastly, we wanted to identify ways in which the system can be made better.

How did we go about it?

In December 2009 we made a freedom of information request to the Department of Health to ascertain, in relation to each of the 53 patient safety alerts issued since 2002 for which the deadline for completion of the required actions had already passed:

- the number of NHS trusts who had or had not completed the required actions in the alert.
- the names of the NHS trusts who had not completed the required actions.

We spoke to representatives at the National Patient Safety Agency and Care Quality Commission to gain a better understanding of how the system works.

We met with Ann Keen MP, the health minister with responsibility for patient safety and her civil servants to discuss some of the results, what was being done about them, and what could be done to improve the system.

Possible limitations of the research data

The information supplied to us by the Department of Health relates to the data held on the Central Alert System as at 29th December 2009. Some trusts will have registered compliance with patient safety alerts between then and publication of this report (16th February 2010).

The Department of Health point out that they are “unable to comment on the receipt and monitoring mechanisms in place in individual trusts and therefore the accuracy of this data: it reflects what has been reported to the Central Alert System”. As the Central Alert System is the only central point where each trust is supposed to report, this in itself is worrying. It should be noted however that it is possible, in theory, that some trusts may not have confirmed implementation of certain patient safety alerts on the Central Alert System, when they have in fact implemented them. It is also possible, in fact very likely based on the limited checks made by the Care Quality Commission, that some trusts may have confirmed that they have implemented patient safety alerts fully when, actually, they have not (the system relies entirely on self-declaration). The data available from the Central Alert System is however the best available data on whether or not NHS trusts are implementing patient safety alerts.

The data supplied by the Department of Health included data on NHS bodies which no longer exist, but which at the time of ceasing to exist (mainly due to mergers etc) had not confirmed implementation of patient safety alerts. For the sake of clarity the findings we have reported relate to existing NHS bodies unless stated. However, it should be noted that new NHS bodies, or those who have taken on previous NHS bodies, have the ability and are supposed to confirm whether the old body's record of not having complied should be removed. There may well be parts of existing NHS bodies where the alerts have not been implemented, whilst the Central Alert System list them as having implemented them. It is also significant in any case that the alerts had not been implemented by the old NHS bodies by the time of their ceasing to exist. There are over three hundred incidences of patient safety alerts not having been implemented by old trusts before they ceased to exist.

HOW THE CURRENT SYSTEM WORKS

The National Patient Safety Agency is the NHS body with responsibility for promoting patient safety in England. One of the ways in which it does this is to identify patient safety issues which are priorities to be addressed by issuing patient safety alerts. This is based on evidence that they:

- (a) are a serious threat to patient safety, usually based on repeated loss of life or damage to health
- (b) can be addressed through practical actions, which are evidence based.

Information about which patient safety issues meet these criteria may come to the National Patient Safety Agency as a result of reports of incidents to its National Reporting and Learning System, or through other reports or evidence given to or gathered by it. Issues are carefully assessed for seriousness and the practicality of addressing them before it is decided to issue a patient safety alert on the subject. There is consultation with experts on both the need for an alert and the content, including the “required actions” which the alert asks recipients to make, and a realistic deadline for NHS trusts to complete the required actions.

Patient safety alerts have been issued by the National Patient Safety Agency since 2004. They are sometimes called “safer practice notices” and more recently the National Patient Safety Agency have developed “rapid response alerts” where an issue is particularly serious and action needs to be taken even more urgently. All alerts contain “required actions” with a deadline for when they should be completed. For details of all patient safety alerts see the National Patient Safety Agency website: www.npsa.nhs.uk. Samples of two alerts are provided below. (Pages 7-9).

Alerts are only sent to NHS trusts for whom they are relevant (for example mental health or learning disability trusts would be excluded if the alert was not relevant to them). However, any trust which believes that the alert which they have received is not relevant to them can notify the Central Alert System to that effect. (Such trusts are excluded from the figures quoted in this report regarding trusts who have not completed the actions).

The Central Alert System is managed by the Department of Health. NHS trusts who are sent a patient safety alert are supposed to notify the Central Alert System if the alert is not applicable to them or when they have completed the actions in the relevant patient safety alert. The system is based on self-declaration by the trusts themselves. There is no guarantee that a trust which declares that it has completed all the required actions actually has. The system also relies on the trust informing the Central Alert System when it has completed the actions.

All NHS bodies are required to implement patient safety alerts issued by the National Patient Safety Agency. This is one of the “core standards” set by the Department of Health. Core standard 1(b) says:

“Healthcare organisations protect patients through systems that ensure that patient safety notices, alerts, and other communications concerning patient safety which require action are acted upon with required timescales”.

Up to now, NHS trusts have had to make a declaration to the Care Quality Commission (previously the “Healthcare Commission”) as to whether it is complying with care standards as part of the “Annual Health Check”. From April 2010 all healthcare organisations will have to make a similar declaration in order to be registered with the Care Quality Commission.

There is no co-ordinated system for monitoring trusts’ compliance with patient safety alerts, intervening where necessary, and extremely limited checking of the accuracy of trusts’ self-declarations that they are compliant. There is an expectation that Strategic Health Authorities (there are 10 of them for different regions of England) should have a role in monitoring. They have a performance management role in respect of trusts in their region, and have access to the information on the Central Alert System. However, our research suggests that very limited use of this data is made by some Strategic Health Authorities. The Care Quality Commission does liaise with the National Patient Safety Agency to identify ‘key’ alerts to focus on as part of inspections of NHS trusts, which are a way of checking on the trusts’ self declarations. In 2007/2008 for example, there was a focus on the alert “safer use of injectable medicines”. It is worrying to note, therefore, that even this alert which has received special attention, had still not been implemented by 104 NHS trusts, almost two years after the deadline.

Based on the limited number of inspections that the Care Quality Commission has done, and the limited number of individual alerts it looks at in detail, the actual rate of non-compliance with alerts is likely to be significantly higher than even the figures in this report suggest. For example, we understand from the Care Quality Commission that in 2007/2008 eight trusts were inspected with regard to the relevant core standard above (C1b), looking just at up to two specific patient safety alerts at each trust. As a result, two trusts (25% of those inspected) had their declared compliance with the core standard ‘qualified’. In 2008/2009 fourteen trusts were inspected on the standard, looking at two alerts for each trust, and four trusts (29% of those inspected) had their declared compliance with the core standard ‘qualified’.

The information on the Central Alert System can be accessed by approved NHS bodies such as the National Patient Safety Agency, Care Quality Commission, Strategic Health Authority and the individual trusts themselves. However, apart from this report, members of the public have no way of knowing how NHS trusts are complying, or otherwise, with patient safety alerts.

Promoting safer use of injectable medicines

The National Patient Safety Agency (NPSA) received around 800 reports a month to its National Reporting and Learning System (NRLS) relating to injectable medicines between January 2005 and June 2006. This represents approximately 24 per cent of the total number of medication incidents. The majority of these resulted in no or low harm to patients. However, there were 25 incidents of death and 28 of serious harm reported between January 2005 and June 2006.

Research evidence indicates that the incidence of errors in prescribing, preparing and administering injectable medicines is higher than for other forms of medicine.^{1,2} In one study, at least one error occurred in 49 per cent of intravenous medicine doses prepared and administered on hospital wards; one per cent were judged to be potentially severe errors; and 29 per cent potentially moderate errors¹ (more details about this study are included in the background section on page 6).

Using data from the NRLS and other evidence,³ the NPSA has identified a number of latent system risks and is making recommendations that can make the use of injectable medicines safer.

Action for the NHS and the independent sector

The NPSA is recommending that all NHS and independent sector organisations in England and Wales take the following steps:

- 1 Undertake a risk assessment of injectable medicine procedures and products in all clinical areas to identify high risks, and develop an action plan to minimise them.
- 2 Ensure there are up-to-date protocols and procedures for prescribing, preparing and administering injectable medicines in all clinical areas.
- 3 Ensure essential technical information on injectable medicines is available and accessible to healthcare staff in clinical areas at the point of use.
- 4 Implement a 'purchasing for safety' policy to promote procurement of injectable medicines with inherent safety features.
- 5 Provide training for, and supervision of, all healthcare staff involved in prescribing, administering and monitoring injectable medicines.
- 6 As part of the annual medicines management audit programme, healthcare organisations should include an audit of medication practice with injectable medicines.

Action deadlines for the Safety Alert Broadcast System (SABS)

Deadline (action underway): 2 July 2007

Action plan to be agreed and actions started

Deadline (action complete): 31 March 2008

All actions to be completed

Further information about SABS can be found at:

www.info.doh.gov.uk/sar2/cmopatie.nsf

Further information on the action points

- 1 Undertake a risk assessment of injectable medicine procedures and products in all clinical areas to identify high risks, and develop an action plan to minimise them.

The NPSA recommends that a pharmacist and a senior practitioner(s) from the relevant clinical area carry out a risk assessment of injectable medicine products and procedures at least once a year. This should be done again before new injectable products or procedures are introduced.

The NPSA has developed a risk assessment tool that can help identify high-risk injectable medicine products and practices. This is available from www.npsa.nhs.uk/health/alerts

Measures that can improve patient safety are outlined below.

For high-risk injectable practices:

- Provide written essential technical information and procedures.
- Use injections that are prepared or used in closed, not open, systems.
- Reinforce and audit policy to ensure all syringes and infusions containing injectable medicines that leave the hands of practitioners during use, are labelled.
- Prepare all cytotoxic and total parenteral nutrition (TPN) products, and make all additions to TPN, in the pharmacy department.
- Reinforce a 24-hour expiry date (or less if pharmaceutically required) for infusion products prepared in clinical areas.
- Ensure there are adequate numbers and types of infusion pumps and syringe drivers available.
- Ensure that single-use products are only used to prepare single doses.
- Have an organisation-wide therapeutic protocol that clarifies unlicensed or 'off-label' use of injectable medicines.

For high-risk injectable products:

- Simplify and rationalise the range and presentation of injectable medicines and provide the most appropriate vial or ampoule sizes.
- Provide ready-to-administer or ready-to-use injectable products of standard strength. This will minimise risks when preparing and administering injectable medicines.
- Provide dose calculation tools. For example, dosage charts for a range of body weights that eliminate the need for calculating doses.
- Provide additional guidance on how to prescribe, prepare and administer high-risk injectable medicines that clarifies how to safely prepare and administer them.

Rapid Response Report 2

From reporting to learning

3 September 2007

Risk of confusion between non-lipid and lipid formulations of injectable amphotericin

Please circulate this advice to all relevant staff

The National Patient Safety Agency (NPSA) is alerting all healthcare staff involved in the use of intravenous amphotericin of the potentially lethal results if non-lipid and lipid formulations of the drug are confused. These different formulations are used for the treatment of systemic fungal infections. The NPSA is aware of two recent deaths and a number of near misses reported to the National Reporting and Learning System (NRLS) and other similar incidents internationally. Further information on the issues raised in this Rapid Response Report, for example the evidence base and a comparison of formulations/doses is at www.npsa.nhs.uk/health/alerts

Intravenous amphotericin is available in four different formulations, non-lipid deoxycholate complex (Fungizone®) and as lipid formulations (Abelcet®, AmBisome®, and Amphocil®). The dosage recommendations for these preparations range from 1 - 5mg/kg. Confusion between the different formulations of amphotericin products can lead to:

- over or under dosing due to the different dose recommendations for each product;
- patients experiencing potentially lethal side effects or sub-therapeutic doses.

For IMMEDIATE ACTION by the NHS and the independent sector the deadline date for ACTION COMPLETE is 1 October 2007

1. The Chief pharmacists, pharmaceutical advisers and heads of pharmacy and medicines management in healthcare organisations should ensure that medical, nursing and pharmacy staff involved in the prescribing, preparation, supply and administration of amphotericin are aware of the potential risks
2. Undertake an immediate risk assessment of amphotericin products and procedures in accordance with NPSA's Patient Safety Alert 20: Promoting safer use of injectable medicines, and take action to reduce the risks.

Further information about risks and actions which can be taken to reduce these risks and details of NPSA's Patient Safety Alert 20 can be found at www.npsa.nhs.uk/health/alerts

The NPSA has informed:

All acute sector and Primary Care NHS organisations, the MHRA, Pharmaceutical Industry, Independent Healthcare Advisory Services, Royal Colleges, Royal Pharmaceutical Society, Guild of Healthcare Pharmacists, NHS Pharmaceutical Aseptic Services Group.

Further NPSA action

We will continue to monitor any incident reports involving intravenous amphotericin which are reported to the NRLS. For further information, contact Professor David Cousins on 020 7927 9356 or david.cousins\(a\)npsa.nhs.uknpsa.nhs.uk) or email rrr@npsa.nhs.uk

CONCLUSIONS

This research reveals worrying evidence that patient safety is not being taken seriously enough and a need to reform the system. Our recommendations are set out at the beginning of this report, which is being provided to the Department of Health and other key bodies for their response and action. Patient safety alerts are a vital tool in the battle to improve patient safety. They are only issued after careful analysis of the seriousness of the issue and the practicality of the required actions, following consultation with experts. They can be a matter of life and death. Full implementation of patient safety alerts is supposed to be an absolute requirement – a prominent “core standard” issued by the Department of Health. However, our research has found that a worrying number of NHS trusts are failing to implement patient safety alerts or to engage with the system. Also, there is no co-ordinated approach taken to monitoring implementation of alerts, or intervening where a trust is failing to implement alerts. This even applies to alerts for which the deadline for implementation passed five years ago, and to trusts who have not implemented large numbers of alerts. This represents a shameful failure to ensure that the NHS learns from past mistakes in order to protect patients. It is putting lives at unnecessary risk and adds insult to injury for those who have been harmed or lost loved ones as a result of lapses in safety.

DETAILED FINDINGS

Table “A” lists NHS trusts who have not notified completion of required actions in patient safety alerts in descending order, with the trust with the highest number of incomplete actions on safety alerts at the top.

Table “B” lists NHS trusts in alphabetical order, providing the number of alerts which the individual trust has failed to notify implementation of in the period covered by this report.

Table “C” below lists the information provided by the Department of Health relating to notification to the Central Alert System of whether required actions in patient safety alerts have been completed or not. It covers the period January 2002 – December 2009, and sets out the relevant information about NHS trusts in England which have or have not notified completion in relation to each patient safety alert.
